Laviolette updates CHBC as puck drops on season

On September 16, one year and a day after the lockout started, the Carolina Hurricanes and Washington Capitals became the first NHL teams to play again as the puck dropped for a preseason game at the RBC Center. Two other preseason games were played that night, and many more have been played since then. The real fun starts when all 30 teams play on October 5, 2005!

Prior to the Capitals game, Coach Peter Laviolette spoke to a large group of Booster Club members at the RBC Center. He was very upbeat about the players and, based on training camp to that point, pleased with how well our set of players will fit in with the "new" NHL.

Coach Laviolette stated that he intended to take a long look at several players that weekend, especially Mike Zigomanis and Pavel Brendl. He prefers to make decisions about players based on their game performances, not just on practices.

Laviolette was also impressed with rookie Niklas Nordgren, who was Carolina's eighth-round draft pick in 1997. (1997? Yes, he has been playing in the Swedish Elite League, where he was fifth in goals last season, since then.) Laviolette's comments focused on Nordgren's speed on the ice, which will be very useful in the NHL of 2005.

Coach Laviolette was asked about how the new rules would affect the game. One comment - there would be a period of getting used to the new rules on obstruction. He predicted 20 penalties in the game that night. Talk about hitting the nail on the head - there were 18 minors and 2 fighting majors! Thankfully, our guys had learned the rules and most of the penalties were against the Capitals.

The time right before a game is generally "down time" for a coach. Coach Laviolette stated he was glad to be able to come talk to us, and he would like to do it again. (We are trying to find a date when that can happen.) Just don't ask him to do it on February 12, 2006. The Canes have a game against Buffalo that evening, February 13 is a travel day for the U.S. Olympic team, and on February 14 they play their first game - against Latvia, probably with Arturs Irbe in goal.

The Carolina Hurricanes have a great coach. We are privileged that USA Hockey also thinks highly of him. We look forward to him leading us into the playoffs this season!

President's Message / Edith Creasy

For those of you who have attended preseason games (which I hope all of you did) or watched practices, you have seen some or all of the 40 players who attended training camp. Justin Peters and Jakub Vojta have gone to their teams in the Ontario Hockey League (and will very possibly be back here in a year or two). Jim Cummins, a free-agent tryout, has been released. Fourteen players have been sent to Lowell, where some will remain and some will be sent on to the Florida Everblades or traded.

After what were by all accounts some difficult decisions as to who to keep and who to cut, the Carolina Hurricanes 2005-06 team roster is now down to 23 players. No "big" names, just a group of really good players.

What matters in the end is not the hype or lack of hype, but the heart.

The Canes have assembled a coaching staff and group of players who they believe can give us a run even better than we had in 2002. At this point in the season, having watched practices and games for several weeks, I believe too that they can do it.

Will they be able to? Will the team chemistry get better and better, some of our young stars have breakout years, and major injuries be avoided? Only time will tell. Will we be there through the peaks and (hopefully few) valleys of the season? I will be, and I hope each of you will also. And bring some friends along for the ride also!

We have gotten many new members of all ages since the CBA was signed, and to you I say: Welcome! Enjoy the events we have planned for the coming season. Give us suggestions if you think we should add something. Most of all, let's get out there and support the Carolina Hurricanes and local amateur hockey.

GO 'CANES!!

Edith

Is this thing really on?

Test. Test. Are we back?

I mean, after watching a handful of pre-season games and seeing the Hurricanes break training camp with a final roster, I still had a hard time believing that opening night is just around the corner. Maybe it's all the new rules changes that we have to digest. Maybe it's the league office once again attempting to crack down on chronic obstruction. Maybe it's just the realization that the geometric properties of the trapezoid now factor into how and when an NHL goalie can handle the puck.

Whatever the cause, my brain is a bit frazzled. I actually heard a guy yell out "no, not outside the trapezoid" at an exhibition game. OK, it was me yelling, but I'm still stunned to have heard that particular phrase uttered at a hockey game.

All adjustments aside, it sure was nice to sit down a couple of weeks ago and enter all those home games in my calendar. Based on the turnout at the Canes' first home exhibition game and at the annual Caniac Carnival, it seems that I'm not alone. Not only is the NHL back, I think we can now see actual evidence that it was badly missed in Raleigh, N. C., despite media rumors to the contrary. Yep, we care...a lot.

A whole new ball...ummm...puck game

Not only is the home opener right around the corner, the new Collective Bargaining Agreement has left hockey fans with a terrific amount of player movement to sort out. Big name players, vets, prominent prospects, coaches and television network coverage teams are all popping up in unexpected places. The NHL is now the national cable television property of the Outdoor Life Network. Peter Forsberg is a Flyer again. Paul Kariya is a Predator and made his final selection between Nashville and Carolina. Chris Pronger took the big bucks to play in... Edmonton?

Yes sir, this really is a new world. Hurricanes General Manager Jim Rutherford says that he expects all 30 NHL teams to have payrolls within a couple of percentage points of the salary cap maximum within two year's time. That will mean even more player movement as teams who thought they could contend in 2005-06 find out that they can't and start to set themselves up for another summer onslaught of free agents. After the dust settles, the league feels that it can compete financially in all 30 of its existing markets.

All I can say is that's going to be one heck of a dust cloud. The salary cap guru just became as important to the front office of your average NHL team as he is to your average NFL team, and clubs that spent foolishly this summer will regret it deeply when the cap figure for 2006-07 is based upon actual revenues rather than a collectively bargained figure. Carolina seems poised to move in either direction after adding proven but relatively low-risk free agents like Cory Stillman. As with all things, time will tell.

Front office outreach program

How many of you would guess that an NHL General Manager would either have or take the time to sit down for lunch with a small group of hockey fans the day before training camp was scheduled to open? Not many I reckon, but Canes GM Jim Rutherford did just that in September.

I was fortunate enough to have been invited to this luncheon at the RBC Center, and even a couple of weeks later I remain floored by the offer to come to the arena, break bread with a few friendly people and talk hockey with the GM of the Canes. Mr. Rutherford offered to answer any question that we could come up with, and proceeded to do just that. He gets a tip of my cap for his commitment to his fan base and for making himself accessible to turkeys like me. Thanks also go to Hurricanes Ticket Sales Manager Kyle Prairie for setting the whole thing up. These kinds of gestures go a long way, particularly in the South where gentility is truly appreciated.

So, how will they do?

That's the big question, isn't it? How will this year's model of the Hurricanes fare in the new look NHL? To be honest, I have no idea. There have simply been too many roster changes and too many rules changes and too much is riding on the renewed clamp-down on obstruction to clear up my crystal ball. Coach Peter Laviolette seems to have assembled a nicely balanced, mobile and deep group of players that should be able to capitalize on their opportunities and on the new rules. But in reality this is one of those seasons where we'll just have to see how things play out on the ice. I'm convinced that the 2005-06 Hurricanes will be more fun to watch, and that the NHL game itself at least stands a chance of being more free-flowing and entertaining. From there I guess you'll just have to come down to the arena and find out for yourself.

Is the regular season shootout good for the NHL?

JOHN GALLAGHER: Yes!

With all due respect to hockey purists out there, where are you? Prior to the lockout, NHL ratings were down to their lowest ever. This is not to say the league is not without its diehard fans, but even diehards must admit there are less fans than there were 10 years ago.

There are certainly many factors that there is not enough space to go into as to why interest and ratings are down. As a hockey fan for more than 18 years, nothing was more frustrating to me than the regular season tie, especially with inflation creeping up ticket prices over the years. I know very few who enjoy the deadlocked games of the regular season.

Does this mean the end for a great defensive effort? While the loser in overtime takes a loss, the NHL still awards a team good enough to play into overtime a point. This is the same point a team would get for making it a tie.

It was about time the NHL put some procedures in place to pit the best shooters against the best goaltenders in the league. Hence, we now have the NHL shootout. Picture Hurricanes Center Eric Staal going one-on-one for a breakaway against Martin Brodeur!

The shootout brings highlights. This means more exciting footage for the sports broadcast. The impact of this particular rule change could very well bring back the casual fans lost to the game during the lockout.

The challenge for NHL clubs will mean staffing up with more skill on NHL rosters. It could mean less ice time for tough guys like Jesse Boulerice. In an overtime situation, coaches will want their best scorers on the ice to avoid an overtime shootout situation.

The crowd will be less inclined to head for the exits with less than a minute left in overtime with a tie game. The shootout gives the crowds something to cheer or boo about and bring a more satisfying end to a regular season contest. Let us not forget there are 82 of these things and everything possible should be done to keep us interested.

Points mean everything in the NHL, especially to those teams jockeying for the bottom playoff spots. In shootout situations, each team has an equal chance to go after that one extra point they lost by allowing a deadlock in regulation and overtime. At the end of the day, this one point takes on a lot of meaning in the overall scheme of things.

The shootout is the best thing to happen to the NHL in years. I look forward to seeing the regular season contests end with a winner and a loser. Isn't that what sports is all about?

JEFF HARROD: No!

OK. I'm going to risk coming across like the grumpy old-timer here, but I really do wonder what all the hubbub is about when it comes to adding a shootout to the NHL's bag of tricks. I mean, the thing is only going to be used in the regular season, right? We won't have to go home after spending two and a half hours in the arena without determining a winner, right?

Yeah, yeah, all that's true, but I was never all that offended by a regular season tie so long as both teams at least attempted to settle matters on the ice. It's only the ties where neither team seems willing to risk their precious point to actually make an effort to win the thing that bothered me, and the equally specious overtime loss point made that argument moot.

Here's my problem with shootouts: they take what is essentially a team game and boil it down to a one on one confrontation. Now breakaways and penalty shots are probably the most exciting plays in hockey...when they occur in the normal course of the game. In other words, those individual opportunities are great when they are EARNED by one TEAM or another. You rarely if ever see an individual player break down the opposing defense and skate in alone on the goalie without the aid of a great pass, or a steal, or some other form of contribution from teammates. Even the much ballyhooed penalty shot generally occurs in the same manner as the breakaway (i.e., one player is sprung loose by a team play and then hauled down by the opposition). In essence the very fact that those types of plays are rare contributes a great deal towards making them exciting.

Now take away the actual team skill that sets up a breakaway or a penalty shot and you're left with just the mechanics...a shooter and a goalie.

Not only that, but now we introduce some sort of contrived sequence where each team takes a turn at the one-on-one match up. Then we allow the outcome of a team game to be determined by these six (or more if it's STILL tied) one-on-one battles.

I'm sorry, but that just isn't what the rest of the game was all about and I simply cannot support letting the outcome of a battle of evenly matched 20-man teams boil down to one guy from either side.

Soon I believe that we will see precious roster spots occupied by shootout specialists. Guys getting paid to play a team game solely on the basis of skill in an individual test. To me, that's just fundamentally wrong.

TV 'road tripping' in Belgium

I was channel-surfing the other night and stopped on the Food Channel to watch Rachel Ray's show "$40 A Day." So what does the Food Channel have to do with hockey?

The reason that I stopped was because the show was set in Brussels, and I was interested in learning more about the homeland of my fellow Booster Club members, Daniel and Wendy van Buynder. (Note: How many of you were aware that we have members not only outside of North Carolina – Virginia, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, Wisconsin and Florida, for example – but even outside of the U.S.?)

This is a recipe for the traditional Belgian stew that was featured on the show. It is a combination of Wendy's recipe, a Dutch recipe that I found on the Internet and Wendy and I translated, and the secret ingredient used by the restaurant on the show - lemon juice. My part was mainly translating into our measurements and syntax.

This stew is very tasty, flavorful, and filling. Basically, it's a chicken and vegetable soup that uses a she-crab-soup type of base instead of the tomato or chicken broth base that you're probably used to. Try this sometime. I found it to be a really neat way to connect again with our great Booster Club members overseas.

Flemish Waterzooi with Chicken Legs

Ingredients (serves up to 7)

7 chicken legs
 1 cup of flour
 1 stick of butter, melted
 1 pint of cream
 1/2 package of white mushrooms
 3 carrots
 3 celery stalks
 5 green onions
 4 red potatoes
 1 quart of water
 1 lemon
 olive or canola oil
 1 tsp basil
 1 tsp paprika

1 tsp thyme
 1/2 tsp nutmeg
 salt and pepper to taste

1. Julienne cut the carrots and celery. Finely slice the potatoes and mushrooms.
2. Bring the water to a boil, adding salt as desired, then add the sliced vegetables and boil for three minutes on high, then reduce the heat to medium.
3. Chop the green onions, and add to the oil in a saucepan.
4. Saute the chicken legs with the oil and onions until the legs are browned on all sides.
5. If the onions are overly browned, drain and remove the onions, then add a couple of extra onions to the simmering vegetables.
6. Scoop the vegetables out of the salted water and save.
7. Add the chicken legs to the water and simmer on low to medium heat for 1 hour.
8. While the chicken is simmering, make a roux of the flour and melted butter, then add in the cream. You want a smooth, thick roux/cream mixture.
9. Mix the paprika, basil, thyme, and nutmeg into the roux/cream mixture.
10. Slowly stir the roux/cream mixture evenly into the chicken legs and broth and continue to simmer for the balance of the hour.
11. After simmering for an hour, add the vegetables back. Heat evenly.
12. Just before serving, squeeze the juice of the lemon into the stew and stir.

Place one chicken leg in a soup bowl, then spoon vegetables and soup over it. Garnish with parsley, and add salt and pepper to taste.

Remembering Terry Sawchuk, hockey's greatest goalie

Every sport has its tragic figures.

Hockey's include the great goaltender Georges Vezina, who had never missed a game in his 15-year pro career before taking himself out of the net on November 28, 1925, complaining of chest pains and dizziness. He was diagnosed shortly thereafter with tuberculosis and died the following March. The trophy awarded annually to the league's best netminder is named in his honor.

Then there's Howie Morenz, the best – and most popular – player of the 20s and 30s. His contemporaries were unanimous in their assertion that Morenz was the most exciting player of the day. But a broken leg suffered in a game on January 7, 1937, put him in the hospital. So serious was the injury that Morenz became convinced he'd never play again. He didn't. Just two months later, after telling a visiting teammate he'd next see the Canadiens play from "up in heaven," the still-hospitalized Morenz died from a coronary embolism. But those attending his funeral later in the Montreal Forum agreed that what really killed Morenz was a broken heart.

Neither Vezina nor Morenz, however, can compare in level of talent – or level of tragedy – to the story of Terry Sawchuk.

Called "Uke" by his teammates – owing to his Ukrainian heritage – Sawchuk may have been the greatest goalie of his time, if not history. But he was also the most troubled and most enigmatic.

Sawchuk was born in Winnipeg, Manitoba, and grew up idolizing his older brother, Mitch. At seven years Terry's senior, Mitch Sawchuk was a talented hockey player who played goalie and taught young Terry the nuances of the game. But Mitch suffered a heart attack and died tragically when he was 17. The loss devastated Terry, but when he donned Mitch's old goalie pads and took to the net, Terry's real greatness emerged. Remembering his dead brother's admonition about balance, Terry developed what would become the famous "Sawchuk crouch." He placed his hands – catching glove on his left, goalie stick in his right – in front of him and bent deeply at his waist, face low to the ice so that his center of gravity was just above his feet. The stance gave him near-perfect balance and great lateral movement, both perfect tools for a goaltender.

In time Sawchuk established himself as the premiere goalie in hockey. He became the first player in history to win "Rookie of the Year" honors in three different leagues in consecutive years and had a goals-against average of 1.95 in his first five years in the NHL, as a member of the Detroit Red Wings.

He amassed 56 shutouts in that time and finished his career with 103 scoreless games – still a record. Playing maskless for most of his career, Sawchuk won four Vezina trophies and four Stanley Cups and was named a first-team All-Star three times – mostly during a time when the league's six teams carried a total of seven goalies.

But Sawchuk was also a womanizing alcoholic who abused his wife and on occasion exhibited violent tendencies. He neglected his seven children. He was moody and brooding and bitter and prone to stretches where he rarely spoke to teammates or family members. He quit briefly during the prime of his career, after a bout with mononucleosis and a nervous breakdown. His playing weight ranged 60 pounds, and various illnesses, accidents and operations followed him around the league to the five different teams for which he played.

The biggest tragedy, though, was his death.

Shortly after the 1970 season ended, a drunken Sawchuk got into an argument with fellow New York Ranger Ron Stewart, with whom Sawchuk shared a rented home during the hockey season. A scuffle began in a bar in Long Island when Stewart began questioning Sawchuk about unpaid bills. Stewart, who recognized that Sawchuk was in one of his famous poor moods, left the bar and went back to the rental home. Sawchuk followed him there.

A shoving match – later ruled as "horseplay" in court – in the dark outside the house came next. After a tussle Sawchuk fell on top of Stewart, driving Stewart's knee into the goalie's stomach.

In great pain, Sawchuk was rushed to the hospital, where his condition – a severe laceration of the liver, which compromised his gall bladder – worsened. In the next four weeks Sawchuk's condition ranged from stable to grave. An emergency surgery May 30th seemed to go well, and Sawchuk stabilized overnight. But shortly after sunrise, he went into respiratory, then cardiac, arrest. An autopsy revealed numerous blood clots, all resulting from Sawchuk's bleeding liver.

What the autopsy could not reveal was the secret to Sawchuk's greatness. That was evident by simply watching the Uke play: he was a perpetual motion machine in goal, making some of the most acrobatic stops imaginable. What drove that greatness – and the monstrosity that Sawchuk sometimes was – was and is more of a mystery.

Sawchuk didn't have much peace in his 40 years on Earth. May he rest in peace now, and may his talent not be forgotten.
